

RAHUL PRASAD: Thank you, Lexi, for ending us on a hopeful note amid a year of unexpected change.

Well, that about wraps it up for us. But before I go, I want to recognize a few people involved in making today possible. I want to thank today's event sponsors one last time: TEDxUofW 2021: Meanwhile is presented by WSECU and is also supported by The HUB, Wells Fargo, and the University of Washington Alumni Association.

I also want to thank our speaker coach, Ro Verdeja, for working individually with each of the speakers in editing their talks and putting together their accompanying presentations.

I want to thank all the speakers for their bravery in sharing their stories with us and for giving us some new things to think about. It's been an honor to get to know them and work with them throughout the last few months.

Finally, I want to thank the three curators one more time. Karina, Arthur, and Lily have been a joy and a pleasure to work with this year. And in my fourth year in TEDx, I could not imagine a better team to be a part of. Thank you for being my family over the last four years and I am excited to be on the other side of the camera, in the audience, next year.

Well, the livestream may be over, meanwhile, the conversation continues online, in our Instagram with our live Q+A with the speakers, and offline, in your own lives. We hope that these talks have inspired you, have generated new ideas, and have motivated you to make change in your own communities.

Thank you for watching TEDxUofW 2021: Meanwhile. I've been your host, Rahul Prasad, stay safe and we'll see you next year!
